		NOTE: In this course we will explore different forms and genres of creative nonfiction through reading, discussion and writing. We will read both published works of contemporary nonfiction and student writing. You should see this class as a place to work on developing and establishing your voice as a writer and your ability to speak and think critically about the craft of writing—your own, your classmate's and that of established writers. Throughout the semester the idea of "essaying" (what it means, what the purpose of the form is and what innovation to the form might look like) will serve as a core discussion of the class. During the semester you will plan, draft and workshop a personal essay, a piece of literary journalism or a researched essay and an experimental essay. We will read work by authors such as: Vivian Gornick, James Baldwin, Jo Ann Beard, Dani

		NOTE: ENGL 470 This course will explore the literature and biography of African American writer, Chester Himes. Through autobiography and biographical writings, as well as Himes' short fiction and his novels, we will investigate the social and political conditions that underpinned Himes' writing for more than forty years, and the style of writing that made him famous—in Europe.

		NOTE: This topics course explores the rich cultural history and eclectic permutations of fairy tales and folklore. Taking to heart Vladimir Nabokov's claim that "All great books are also great fairy tales," we will explore the special style of fairy tales—as sparse, flat and depthless while simultaneously wild, weightless and colorful. Students may bring to workshop any of their current writing projects; however, some experimentation with the class topic will be required. Beyond paying close attention to a variety of wonder tales from France, Germany, Russia and elsewhere, readings will include contemporary revisionist fairy tale narratives in Angela Carter's The Bloody Chamber, Gatean Soucy's The Little Girl Who Was Too Fond of Matches, and Amos Tutuola's The Palm-Wine Drinkard, among others.
